Top ten of everything 2008

By M. K. Gillis

We use this book when we have family over for dinner. It engages everyone.

I ask the ? and then each person that wants to participate answers. The rule is that each person responds and then the correct answer is given.

If you choose to follow this format, it allows each person, no matter what age or intelligence, to give their response. Then when the caller gives the correct answer people immediately reflect on their own response first; then they think about whether they were correct. Believe it or not all this happens quickly (in my experience). There is not usually a focus on who was right or wrong. It may take some time to get participants used to the idea of going around the table before hearing whether their answer was correct.

Children, probably, benefit from this approach the most, however; this approach allows everyone to save face.

Students LOVE this!

By Doc W8

This is a wonderful addition to our school library's reference section that also includes The Guinness Book of Records. I can hand this to a bored and fidgeting sophomore knowing that he will not surface from it until the bell rings. That is high praise indeed. This compendium of lists is fun, interesting, arresting, and always has something to linger over. It ends up all over the library. Please, more goodies like this!!!
